

Childrens do learn," Bush tells school kids

Reuters Wednesday, 26 September 2007 / 2:03 p.m. ET

US President George W. Bush poses with children from Public School 76 after giving a progress report on his administration's "No Child Left Behind" program at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel in New York.

NEW YORK — George Bush made his latest grammatical slip-up at a made-for-TV event where he urged Congress to reauthorize the "No Child Left Behind Act," the centerpiece of his education policy, as he touted a new national report card on improved test scores.

The event drew New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, plus teachers and about 20 fourth and fifth graders from PS 76.

During his first presidential campaign, Bush — who promised to be the "education president" — once asked: "Is our children learning?"

On Wednesday, Bush seemed to answer his own question with the same kind of grammatical twist.

"As yesterday's positive report card shows, childrens do learn when standards are high and results are measured," he said.

The White House opted to clean up Bush's diction in the official transcript.

Bush is no stranger to verbal gaffes. He often acknowledges he was no more than an average student in school and jokes about his habit of mangling the English language.

Just a day earlier, the White House inadvertently showed how it tries to prevent Bush from making even more slips of the tongue than he already does.

As Bush addressed the U.N. General Assembly on Tuesday, a marked-up draft of his speech briefly popped up on the UN Website, complete with a phonetic pronunciation guide to get him past troublesome names of countries and world leaders.

http://news.yahoo.com/s/nm/20070926/od\_uk\_nm/oukoe\_uk\_bush\_grammar